2 a Sound on film p. 79

To begin with motion pictures were silent films – a genre that has regained some interest in the past decade. At the advent of the 20th century a new and exciting innovation was exhibited in Paris: a sound film. However, it took some time for so-called “talkies” to establish themselves. Completely normal to us – and in fact from the 1930s onwards – a motion picture that included synchronized sound was first only available for short films. The first sound-on-disc systems often proved unreliable, but people’s interest had already been sparked. In 1927 the prominent technology was Vitaphone, creating the famous The Jazz Singer. However the system was soon replaced with ways of having sound-on-film. The reason was simply that distribution was easier and the more often a disc was played, the more its quality dwindled. After 20 showings the disc became unreliable and could often not be used any longer.
